

Which came first:
entrepreneurship
, business or management?

Explain the evolution of
entrepreneurship,
management, factories
and business

•Let's imagine that entrepreneurship, business, management, and factories are like four friends who grew up together. They have a long history and have been through many changes over time.

•Entrepreneurship was the first of the four friends. It started a long time ago when people had an idea and decided to turn it into a product or service that they could sell. They became their own bosses and started their own businesses.

•Business came next, as more and more people started selling their products and services. Over time, businesses grew bigger and became more complex, with many different people working together to make products and provide services.

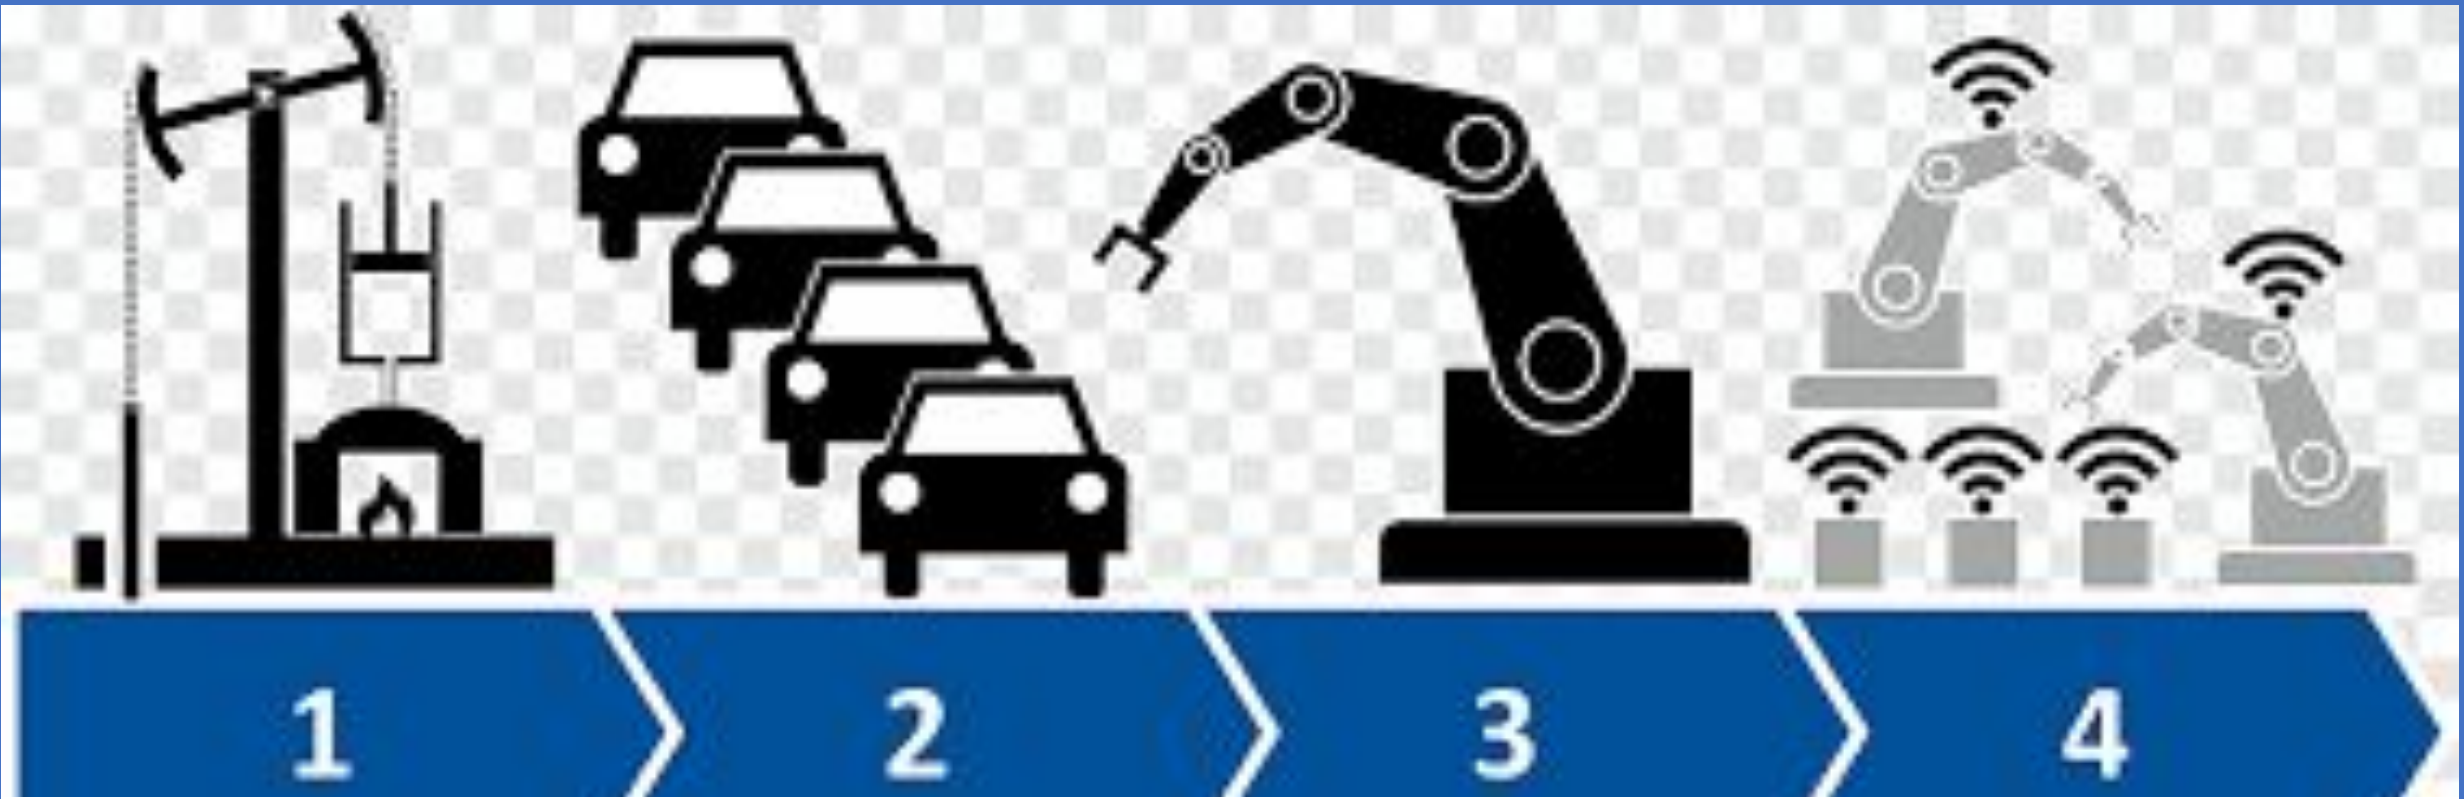

- Management came next, as businesses grew bigger and more complex. Managers were needed to help keep everything organized and running smoothly. They made sure that everyone was working together and that the business was making a profit.

•Factories were the last of the four friends to arrive on the scene. They were big buildings where many people worked together to make products. Factories were a big part of the Industrial Revolution, when businesses started using machines to make things faster and more efficiently.

What is the Industrial Revolution?
